Summary: Our increased understanding of the human microbiome could enhance our understanding of how interactions with gut biota may affect the bioavailability, and thus toxicity, of environmental contaminants. Knowledge of environmental biogeochemistry combined with recently revealed gut meta-omics findings may lead to predictive models and possibly modulation of metal toxicity. We demonstrate this principle by considering the potentials of mercury biogeochemical transformations in the GI tract.